

"Fire Stations in Portland"

Source: Portland Fire & Rescue Documents

Fire Stations in Portland are as much a part of the organizational history as the members. Some have been loved, other stations loathed. But they have existed since the first fire company was established and are a significant part of Portland Fire & Rescue's story.

A variety of architecture has graced the many station designs over the years. Little has been found about any significant detail behind it. However, clues and different passages from various time periods provide important clues.

The first firehouses used by the volunteers were sometimes a loaned building. Public subscription, volunteer efforts, and city funding would help build fire stations as far back as the 1850s.

Purpose built firehouses in the volunteer era were often fairly ornate and comfortable buildings. They served as a gathering place for the volunteers, even serving as the home for some men. Because volunteers were most often made up of prominent businessmen in the community, it is expected that funds came from these people to help with the internal comforts. In many ways, the firehouse (and crew) that was most attractive to potential members would often draw in the most people. The larger crew had better capabilities and more prestige in the community.

Since Portland was not using horses until 1883 when it became a paid fire department (some exceptions may have existed when members contributed horse-power to their volunteer company), it was not necessary to build firehouses capable of accommodating horses. Stations built from the 1880s and later incorporated horse stalls, hay lofts, and other features catering to horses. Stations would typically have dormitories, locker rooms, and living rooms, but not necessarily kitchens. Blueprints from the 1912 fire station at SE 35th and Belmont (Station 9, and later, the Historic Belmont Firehouse) would show that the original design had no kitchen. Firefighters would either go home for meals or patronize local restaurants.

The first stations built to accommodate motorized vehicles (without capability of housing horses) only came two years after the last horse drawn apparatus was purchased. The first bungalow station, Station 18 in Irvington, was a demonstration project showcasing a new design. The buildings were more residential in design to blend into neighborhoods more readily but contained all the necessary elements of a fire station. Hose towers, for example, would extend into a pit in the basement rather than extend skyward in the form of a tower. The tops would terminate in a dormer to disguise the feature. So successful was this design that most all of the buildings are still standing across Portland even 100 years after being built. All of the in-service bungalow stations did require modification of the apparatus bay to accommodate the larger fire engines of modern day.

The list below shows the service record of every building used as a fire station in Portland's history. The information is drawn from fire bureau annual reports and documents. This list not only provides an inventory of the properties, but also chronicles the movement of crews assigned to the stations.

Over the years, some stations were upgraded or rebuilt on the site where they previously sat. In other cases, they moved or were closed completely due to station re-location plans. While an exhaustive search has led to this list, information occasionally comes along that adds a new detail.

The list is divided by the city quadrant (N, NW, NE, S, SW, SE) where stations are located. Listings within the quadrant begin alphabetically by street name then numerically by street number. Many others, while not under the ownership of the city, remain in use by private ownership. Addresses listed in parenthesis are the old Portland addressing system.

The header with each station's address is color coded to indicate it is:

- currently in service
- in private ownership but still exists
- no longer exists.
